Course Description

This course provides students an introduction to the basic principles of second language acquisition (SLA), a discipline that explores how humans learn additional languages after they have acquired their first language. The course offers a comprehensive understanding of SLA, mainly addressing the following topics: (a) theoretical accounts of first and second language acquisition, (b) various environmental, learner, and linguistic factors influencing SLA, and (c) characteristics of learner language as manifested in second language development. It also explores how theoretical claims and research findings of the field provide insights for second language teaching and learning
