Course Description
This course explores the social constructions of so-called deviant identities and the discourses that sustain or challenge the idea of "deviant." The course looks at what has been considered deviant at given historical moments and at what is considered deviant in our own times. Students analyze the notion of criminal identity and its relation to deviance and rehabilitation/punishment. The course is based around the sociological idea that "normal" and "abnormal" are often socially and culturally constructed and draws on intellectual thought from: theology, philosophy, political science, law, biology, psychology, and human geography.
