Course Description

This course explores the discipline of clinical psychology and the ways in which clinical psychologists work to reduce distress and improve psychological well-being of clients. It covers the core principles and features of contemporary theory, and evidence-based approaches and how they are applied to facilitating change in people with a range of physical, intellectual, and mental health problems. Students learn basic therapeutic skills used in everyday clinical practice and discuss the effectiveness of treatments in clinical practice for a range of problems common in people accessing clinical psychology services. The course critically analyzes the strengths and limitations of clinical psychology and equips students with an awareness of the reciprocal links between theory, research, and clinical practice in the development and evaluation of psychological work.
