Course Description

The course provides a theoretical foundation for analyzing public policy and skills to communicate the analyses to non-academic stakeholders in public policy. The first part of the course explores theoretical issues relevant to the analysis of public policy. Students focus on examples from both national and comparative public policy. The second part uses the theoretical foundations to examine lobbying on specific policies through case studies which may include: family policy, health policy, education policy, defense policy, business policy, constitutional policy, and policies that are cross-cutting in nature.
