Course Description

The topics in this course are critical to people management in contemporary organizations, for example, leadership and team processes that enhance individual, team, and organizational performance. This course also seeks to understand atypical forms organizational phenomena. Alternative forms of organizations and unique individual circumstances have become more commonplace in recent years; however, theories about organizational behavior (OB)—designed to apply to “typical” workplace behavior and contexts—have not kept pace. The emphasis in this course is on critically evaluating existing OB theories as they relate to extreme forms of workplace behavior (e.g., workaholism, pro- and antisocial behavior) and contexts (e.g., poverty, military, hospital, and artist culture). Weekly topics include isolated and high-pressure work environments, passion work, and compliance and proactivity. In general, this course examines the central issues of organizational behavior by applying primarily sociological and social psychological theories and methods.
