Course Description

This course examines the tensions and contradictions that arise from societal, political, and economic demands in relation to the developing role and form of education policy and practice. It considers education as the cornerstone for the realization of competing social imaginaries by examining the complex ways in which economic priorities, technological advancements, and demographic, and labor trends intersect, posing new problems and new demands for education. This course considers the use of artificial intelligence, the Quantified Self Movement, and satellite-enabled distance learning as concrete manifestations of these global trends.
