Course Description
This course examines the nature of ethical properties, the nature of ethical judgements, and the nature of reasons for action. The first week begins with an introduction to metaethics, then each following week covers moral motivation, desires and reasons, emotion and moral judgment, character, well-being, and lastly natural science and moral knowledge. Throughout the course students critically discuss what science can teach us about ethics; explain reasons, internalism and externalism, and provide arguments for preferring one view over the other; evaluate competing accounts of the relationship between emotion and moral judgment; explain two or more theories of how we come to have moral knowledge; and assess empirical arguments for and against virtue ethics.
