Course Description
This course examines comparative politics: the study of domestic politics in different countries. Comparative politics emphasizes the similarities and differences between states' political systems, both as important content about how politics is conducted around the world, and as a method for understanding general political processes. The module covers formal political institutions and aspects of civil society, public attitudes, and political culture, and how they interact to produce political and policy outcomes. Institutional topics include the nature of states and their development, democracy and dictatorship, and variation in democratic institutions and decision-making processes.
