Course Description
This course takes an in-depth look at the political and economic relationship between China and Africa dating back to the 1950s. Development aid, commerce, and investment ties have been dramatically reinforced since the 2000s after the founding of the Forum on China-Africa Cooperation by Beijing. China's African policy is speeded up by China's growing role in the world economy. The course analyzes the structure of China-Africa relations, describing cooperation in key sectors, and questioning China's influence and its impacts on Africa's development. In order to understand the role of China within the context of Africa's rise, the course draws comparisons with other emerging economies, and the so-called traditional donors.
