Course Description
This course explores the ways in which digital technologies have transformed the way we experience our social lives and have shaped the ways in which we connect (and disconnect) with each other and wider society. The course examines claims that we now live in a networked society, an information society, or a digital age, and explores the ways in which our social spaces, relationships, and activities are mediated by and through digital technologies. The course draws on some key sociological themes: community, the self, gender, consumption, power, and exclusion, and uses these to evaluate the extent to which contemporary culture is digitally mediated.
