Course Description
This course uses a historical timeline from America's founding to the Trump era to map out the key concepts and theories of US Foreign Policy. The course provides students with the critical analytical and theoretical tools to understand the evolving status of the United States as a hegemonic power in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. In particular, this course interrogates the role of external and internal factors influencing America's behavior in the world. Students use the theories of international relations and public policy to study in great detail the actors, institutions, and doctrines relevant to US Foreign Policy. The learning material ranges from textbooks, journal articles, films, documentaries, and public policy documents.
