Course Description

Students work on two complementary projects exploring materiality through assemblage construction and reductive working methods as a way of engaging with the current debates surrounding environmental and social sustainability in the arts.
Students are encouraged to consider the concept of sustainability in reference to specific cultural, environmental and socio-political frameworks and the implications for the production of art in the 21st century. They explore these issues through the development of a sculptural process that incorporates experimenting, presenting and reflecting. The focus for these projects is the development of relative thinking through physical experimentation and reflexive methodologies.
