Course Description
For almost 40 years, the relationship between religion and politics have exploded on the international public stage, contributing to the instability of the world. It is however difficult for a citizen of the twenty-first century to connect with religious facts without connecting it to emotion. This course allows students to better understand the complexity of the relationship between traditional religions (Judaism, Christianity, Islam, and Hinduism) and politics. The approach is multidisciplinary, bringing together history, philosophy, and political science. Students decipher the long history of politico-religious relations, marked notably by fear and violence.
