Course Description

This course explores the interdisciplinary field of feminist theory, looking at the historical development of feminist theory across the humanities and social sciences, but emphasizing current developments in feminist theorizing around questions of identity, embodiment, gender construction, and the relationship between gender and sexuality. The primary objective of this course is for students to develop a broad understanding of a range of feminist approaches to analyzing social structures, texts, and cultural phenomena so that they can compare and apply these approaches in their written academic work and everyday life.
