Course Description
This course is an advanced introduction to International Political Economy (IPE). The course divides into three inter-related parts: history of the international economy and the various ways in which it has been ordered politically, including competing accounts of world order, and the necessary and sufficient conditions for the construction and maintenance of a liberal economic order; detailed examination of liberalism (in its economic and IR variants), economic nationalism, realism and neo-realism, Marxism, and varieties of critical IPE (including feminism); finance, production, trade, consumption, the environment, and crises. This course includes debates about the locus and operation of power, the significance of institutions, the prospects for global governance, the role of the state under conditions of globalization, and the importance of ideas (such as neoliberalism).
