Course Description
Developments during the early modern period, which spans from roughly the late fifteenth to late eighteenth century, laid the foundations for present-day Europe. States took on recognizable forms, merchants discovered new markets within and outside of Europe, and the Reformation, the scientific revolution and the Enlightenment yielded new insights and worldviews. The Early Modern Period course focuses on three, often closely intertwined, subject areas: state-building, socio-economic developments and cultural and religious developments. The course considers the following questions: how is state building connected to the emergence of new military tactics and technologies? What was the impact of overseas expansion by European nations? How did the Reformation and state-building become intertwined?
