Course Description

Political polls have emerged as an essential element of political and electoral life because they are frequently consulted by citizens, commented on by journalists, and dissected by politicians. In their various forms, they constitute an important cog in the public debate, to which actors and observers of the political game refer. The course is structured in three parts: the historical development of political surveys, their technical realization, and their relationship to democracy. Political life is thus approached from various angles: historical, electoral, media, sociological, and psychological. An important place is left to analyze the political and electoral news (campaign for the European elections) in France and abroad through surveys.
