Course Description

This course is an introduction into the new methods of understanding international history, by broadening the history of international relations. It is chronological, looking at important events but also at the accumulation of dates and events. It is also thematic, exploring the new research and thinking internationally about regional differences and the global scale. It also takes into account the diversity of different visions of history. It is neither Franco nor European nor American centered. The goal is to show what history can say about the present. The lecture shares, without scientific jargon or superfluous details, the synthesis of a plethoric bibliography.
