Course Description

This course considers whether the existence of a supranational political space organized by structures and common cleavages is at the heart of the interrogations regarding the European integration process. The goal of this course is to explore several sides to this interrogation, questioning if the political behaviors (voting, mobilizations) of Europeans can show signs of the construction of this supranational political space. Thus the partisan structures and the voting behaviors are analyzed (notably in light of the European elections of May 2019) as well as the mobilizations (NGO, associations, interest groups of all types) surrounding the central issues of European integration (economics, environment, health, basic rights, culture).
