Course Description
This course explores developmental themes that occur across different stages of life from birth and infancy through adulthood and into old age. Although development at each stage of life has unique features, there are also important themes that recur across the lifespan. The course draws on ecological theory and the lifespan perspective to organize our understanding of these developmental themes including physical growth and aging, health and wellness, attachment, cognition, moral development, personality and self, gender and sexuality, parenting, and death and dying. The course draws on an assigned textbook as well as on readings from international, peer reviewed literature.
