Course Description
This course covers key sociological dimensions of activities and interactions related to the leisure industries. It focuses on sociological concepts, meaning, structure, and functions in leisure and work. These concepts include the notions of leisure participation, why it is that leisure participation is not evenly or randomly distributed within the population, and what models might help explain that. It investigates key scholars and schools who have advanced thinking in this field, including Pierre Bourdieu, who theorized how tastes are socially acculturated, and the Leicester School, whose work focused on understanding the phenomenon of football hooliganism.
