Course Description
Security is the single most important concept in International Relations, but the way we think about it has changed greatly over time. This course looks at the different facets of security as the concept (and the world) has evolved. The course begins with traditional military security, and what might be called strategic studies, and follows the evolution of the idea to include newer and increasingly important concepts such as human and environmental security. By the end of the course, students have a well-rounded understanding of the concept of security, and are able to use it as a tool to investigate all aspects of international relations. Text: Alan Collins, CONTEMPORARY SECURITY STUDIES. Assessment: Mid-term essay (20%), Final essay (30%), Class participation (20%), Security briefing (30%).
