Course Description

This course examines kinship, a foundational concern of anthropology. Kinship is, essentially about, relationships. The course investigates the forms, meanings and manipulations of relationships that people have constructed across various historical and cultural contexts. Comparing the diverse ways in which people live, labor and love, it examines the centrality of kinship to understandings of what it means to be a person. Concurrently, kinship is a medium for grappling with the interactions between intimate life and public culture, domestic production-reproduction and political economy, everyday practices and conceptual structures and affection and moral obligations. The focus of the course is on how kinship is a vital force in contemporary societies.
