Course Description
This course explores some of the contributions made to the social sciences by social and cultural anthropology. Students explore key insights of the discipline and the perspectives that are offered by anthropologists on a range of themes. This course addresses the anthropological notion of the social construction of human realities, including many that are commonly experienced as natural. Using case studies on topics related to culture, power, and language, students relate those to theoretical developments, central concepts, and schools of thought in anthropology.
