Course Description
The patterns of Africa's interaction with the rest of the world is unique. Its peoples have had to contend with acute internal and external pressures which have stretched and shaped its systems overtime. While some of the pressures have undermined the continent's state institutions and thus inhibited their capacity to underpin human flourishing, others have served as a source of institutional innovations resilience and creative adjustment. This course provides a study of current trends and forces that shape Africa‘s relations in the global system and examines theories of geo-politics, geo-economics, and meta-geopolitics in the study of Africa's international relations. Topics include globalization, NEPAD, human security, debt, HIV/AIDS, environment, arms proliferation, and the World Trade Organization.
