Course Description
This course explores the still image and encourages critical reflection on issues of form and representation in relation to students' own work. Students learn processes and techniques involved in digital imaging. They work individually to complete set exercises both in and out of class, and produce a series of images to a set brief. Students also learn to use production technology in a specific medium. They apply medium-specific critical and aesthetic discourses to their own and others' creative media projects and demonstrate critical reflection on the intersection of practice and theory.
