Course Description

In this course, students explore a selection of Italian sources on the myth of Europa from early-modern to contemporary literature, with a particular focus on operatic adaptations. The myth of Europa was present at the very beginnings of opera, in late Renaissance Italy, and the operatic adaptations are particularly instrumental to unlocking the potential for critical and creative interpretations of this highly influential myth of origins. Students develop a critical understanding of the myth's dominant narratives of migration, gender, and ethnicity by contrasting them with the idea of the "original" in translation and performance, challenging in particular the conventional associations of narrative voices and performative roles. The study of the myth of Europa throughout different times and cultures, languages, genres, and media enhances the learning experience by contributing to a wider sense of belonging and becoming in the construction of European identities.
