Course Description
In this course, students examine a range of questions: Why is it so difficult to define terrorism? What are the implications of said definition? What factors motivate terrorism? What strategic choices do terrorists make? What methods do counter-terrorist forces employ, how do these help to reduce violence, and is it successful? What is the role of the public? The literature is theoretically motivated and empirically driven. Students are introduced to the fundamental theoretical and policy debates surrounding terrorism and the current trends in terrorism and counter-terrorism.
