At the end of this semester-long course, students are expected to: understand very frequent expressions and vocabulary relating to what concerns very closely the speaker (e.g. oneself, his family, his purchases, his close environment, his work); capture the essence of simple, clear announcements and messages; read very simple short texts; find specific predictable information in common documents such as small ads, flyers, menus and schedules; understand short, simple personal letters; communicate simple, routine tasks that require only a simple, direct exchange of information on familiar topics and activities; have very brief exchanges even if, as a rule, understanding is not enough to continue a conversation; use a series of phrases or phrases to describe in simple terms family and other people, living conditions, training and current or recent professional activity; write notes and simple and short messages; write a very simple personal letter, for example thank you letters.
