Course Description

The course discusses how the economy deals with the sexual division of labor and gender inequalities. It is divided into three parts: the first discusses the history of the sexual division of labor and ends with an international comparison of gender inequalities in the economic sphere; the second focuses on the history of economic thought from Smith to today; and the third is devoted to current theories dealing with inequality and discrimination, as well as empirical approaches to measure the extent of these phenomena. The course explores both the neoclassical approaches and those proposed by heterodox, economic lesser-known students, such as the original institutional approach.
