Course Description
This course provides an opportunity to approach study of international politics by tackling `low politics` issues as the starting point of inquiry. It covers how to appraise the complexities embedded in the search for ways and means of addressing a transnational issue. This appraisal begins with knowledge about descriptions of an issue. Among other useful analytical approaches, the course investigates the domestic-international connections (and their lack of) in public policy, while paying particular attention to economic and technology factors that affect conflict/dispute resolution of transnational challenges. The course also discusses the applicability of mainstream international political theories for understanding the phenomena under examination.
