Course Description

This course gives students an understanding of the power and limitations of the theoretical constructs used to interpret human behavior in economics, as brought to bear on observed consumption behavior; to enable them to critically evaluate policies targeted at individuals, both in terms of their theoretical basis and of their practical importance, and to recognize the importance of measurement in the design and evaluation of policy and the challenges it poses. Students build upon the core material learned in the first two years of the BSc (Econ) Economics degree program to further study problems pertinent to our understanding of individual choices, to their measurement, and to the design and evaluation of policy.
