Course Description
This course focuses on the many different ways in which publics engage with science in face-to-face contexts; how scientists engage members of the public through direct interactions, such as science festivals, and museums; and how specific public groups, such as patient and citizen groups get involved, and engage with, scientific and medical research. Alongside gaining a practical understanding of how to organize such activities, students will also critically reflect on the theory and context that underpins such activities such as models of publics and audiences, rationales for engagement in different contexts, and the wider policy contexts and historical trends.
