Course Description
Charles Dickens is a writer indelibly associated with place, and above all with the sights, sounds, and social debates of 19th-century London. His status as a laureate of London life is complicated, however, by his restless journeys across Britain, Europe, and America, and his imaginative engagement with geographies of empire and globalization. This course explores the relationship between local attachment and global movement across Dickens's fiction, travel writing, and journalism.
