Course Description

This course examines modern British society, from the aftermath of WWII to the present. It examines significant changes that have taken place, including changing attitudes about identity, the role of the state in providing welfare, and the function and reach of education. These changes are examined in the context of significant cultural conflicts and challenges in the areas of leisure and pleasure, the family structure, social groupings, and crime. The course contrasts these changes with elements of deep-seated continuity, in the form of recurring patterns of ethnic, gender, class, and wealth inequalities.
