Course Description

Though the Romantic era in England from roughly 1780 to 1830, the cultural developments of the period were of such significance and influence that many argue we are still living in a "Romantic age." Amid revolutions abroad, social unrest at home, massive technological and economic shifts, and new ideas about the nature of the self and about the rights of individual men and women, the writers studied in this course saw the world changing with an unprecedented pace, and felt alternately exhilarated, terrified, enraged, and amused by the changes they witnessed. The course looks at how Romantic writers used experiments with literary form both to respond to these social and historical contexts, and addresses more intimate concerns of love and loss, memory and desire. Students read some of the most provocative, most lasting, and most exciting poetry of the period. Poets studied include the "Big Six" standard to Romanticism courses--Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Percy, Shelley, Byron, and Keats. Topics include gender and sexuality; the natural world and the new metropolis; domestic life in wartime; the social role and responsibility of the writer; the poet as celebrity; childhood, imagination and dream.
