Course Description
This course considers Britain's stance and role in the process of European integration, with particular attention on the question of why Britain has been reluctant to embrace European integration. Focus is on contemporary problems and prospects of closer British ties to the European Union and related bodies. Topics include the trajectory of European integration and Britain's role therein, major strains of Britain's foreign policy since the middle of the 20th century, the inter-relations and inter-dependencies between Britain and European politics, and different aspects of contemporary international politics. Assessment: midterm exam (40%), final exam (40%), attendance and participation (10%), response paper (10%).
