Course Description
This course considers theoretical issues raised by contemporary psychological sciences. These issues are continuous with the central questions in philosophy of mind, such as how brains give rise to minds; and how should we understand paradigmatic mental phenomena like thinking, reasoning, perceiving, and experiencing? In practice the philosophy of psychology can be thought of as an empirically-informed perspective on philosophy of mind. This course focuses on some topical psychological or information-processing explanations, considers how they work, and what they purport to explain. The course extends into areas where the rise of cognitive neuroscience and the methods of functional neuro-imaging have made a major impact.
