Course Description

The course explores the global history of three themes - goods, peoples, and ideas. Students interrogate the new forms of power which sought to reshape global connections in the period from c. 1450 and explore the ways in which polities and societies in Asia, Africa, and Latin America engaged with and resisted the rise of European power and produced alternative imagined geographies, leading to the creation both of new connections and new forms of disconnection. The course also provides an opportunity to reflect critically on the writing of global history and to consider how to best make sense of the intersections of the local and the global in this period.
