Course Description

This course focuses on different scholarly perspectives on ethnicity, nationality, ethnic groups, and nations. Divided into three parts, it begins by establishing an analytical framework for the study of ethnicity and nationalism that stresses the historic specificity and social construction of ethnic groups and nations. In the middle part, the course examines a range of ways in which ethnicity and nationality are experienced, legitimated, and reproduced in the modern world. The final part of the course is devoted to contemporary applications of these concepts: how ethnicity and nationalism manifest themselves in politics, culture, and everyday life. Combined, these three parts establish different ways in which ethnicity and nationality are modern social constructs.
