Course Description

Using mainly law, sociology, and economics but also philosophy, literature, and psychology; and focusing on different actors such as states, societies, consumers, and banks; the course deals with current controversial issues such as the rising role of money, the global distribution of wealth, the erosion of monetary sovereignty, the legal challenges of alternative and stateless currencies, and the disruptive effects of cryptocurrencies on finance and banking industries. The course is divided into three parts: the origins and essence of money, the socio-economic and legal issues raised by money in today's society, and the current challenges coming from the rise of cryptocurrencies.
