Course Description
Religious belief represents a significant facet in the complexity of today's world. Communications and media experts in particular need to understand the philosophical, historical, sociological, communicative, and doctrinal aspects of major religious traditions in order to provide balanced and unbiased reports. This course analyzes religions in the context of their historical development and their symbiotic relationship with local cultures, examining cross-tradition similarities and the uniqueness of each of the religions. Special emphasis is placed on the attitudes of the various religious traditions toward politics and violence, and the role of communications in this process. Students discuss the particularities of religious and non-religious worldviews in Central Europe and in a larger European context.
