Course Description
This course examines the histories and representations of gender, seeking to understand how gender is constructed by societies, institutions, and individuals, through the critical analysis of texts, works of art, and public actions. Gender, its role, construction, and historiography are brought together by scholars across the school in an undergraduate interdisciplinary course. The operation of gender "as a tool of analysis" is examined in histories of the body, sexuality, medicine, religion, politics, institutions, and representations in a variety of texts and contexts which show the inherent instability and elusive nature of many gendered identities.
