Course Description
This course brings together a discussion of sociological debates on inequality and latest empirical evidence to explore the gaps between rich and poor, included and excluded, advantaged and disadvantaged from a local, national, and global perspective. It encourages intersectional perspectives on different sources and forms of inequalities to highlight and challenge the assumptions on how they operate in contemporary societies. This course includes core sociological topics such as class, gender, and ethnicity and the emerging patterns of inequalities within social settings, such as education, income and wealth, health, citizenship, crime, and geography.
