Course Description
The course explores the key components of the European Union-United States diplomatic relations in the twenty-first Century. It analyzes the way diplomacy is designed and practiced in the US and the EU. Several areas of cooperation are studied through the lens of current tensions, including in the specific areas of trade, security, and human rights. The course also explores how the populist and nationalist political movements and neo-authoritarian tendencies, which are challenging liberal democracy on both sides of the Atlantic, are affecting the transatlantic relationship. To this end, this course also examines the foreign policy specificities of the Trump presidency and the EU response to them.
