Course Description
This course is an introduction to the fundamental principles and procedures of empirical research in sociology. The course presents the theoretical and practical challenges involved in problem formulation, research design, data collection, and data analysis; examines some of the major types of both qualitative and quantitative social research methods (e.g., structured interviews, questionnaires, qualitative interviews, and ethnography) and the sampling, measurement and analysis issues involved with their use. Students conduct and report a basic qualitative interview project.
