Course Description
The novel has always been a source of critical debate and even social anxiety. This course examines a range of significant fiction from early in the 18th century to the early 19th century. Themes for discussion might include the origins of the novel; the relationship of the novel to other genres (newspapers, letters, political pamphlets, graphic satire); the central role of women authors in shaping the novel; the moral and religious aspects of the genre; the relationship of the novel to contemporary theories of personality, sympathy, affection and identity. Students read a range of important novels from the period and are encouraged to explore the wide range of secondary literature on the novel.
