Course Description
This course explores the interplay of scientific, clinical, social, religious, and moral judgements invested in "framing" a disease, and how these "frames" have developed in different times and places. It also examines the ways in which race, gender, and sexuality have each been framed in pathological terms, and how these framings have been challenged. Students explore the strikingly different ways in which Western people have thought about their bodies, in sickness and in health, over the past four hundred years.
