Course Description

This course covers the issues related to social inequality and healthcare which include development of chronic illness, medical deserts, hospital crises, the regulation of pesticides, and the price of pharmaceutical drugs. The stakes of health are omnipresent in the press, political debates, and the daily lives of everyone. The public health sector has become a fertile field for sociologists who have developed a series of concepts and mobilized methods to understand deviance, social inequality, professional groups, organizations, public action and science and techniques. Thusly, this course is useful for students who wish to better understand the connection between health and society and those who wish to add to their knowledge of sociological theory and methods.
