Course Description
The word indifference is most often used by critics as a negative and judgmental term that puts forth a certain characterization, or better yet, caricature, of Postmodernism's ambitions and achievements. This course explores a very different and more complex sense of indifference than the negative interpretation. In doing so, it opens up a different framework for thinking about art, architecture, and urbanism in the last fifty years. Throughout the course, students look at a broad range of art and architectural examples, as well as draw upon relevant art historical, literary, theoretical, and philosophical writings on topic.
